Meeting of the National Capital Area Linguistic Anthropologists and Recovering Voices

Recovering Voices will host the next meeting of the National Capital Area Linguistic Anthropologists (NCALA). This is an opportunity to learn more about Recovering Voices and the work of colleagues at the Smithsonian Institution.

In collaboration with communities and international partners, the Recovering Voices program seeks to improve access to the Smithsonian's expertise and diverse collections – archival, biological and cultural – as well as support interdisciplinary research in support of endangered languages. Through a series of short presentations, members of the Recovering Voices team will provide a general overview of the program and discuss some of our key activities, including current research in addition to outreach and education initiatives.

A collaborative initiative of National Museum of Natural History, National Museum of the American Indian and the Smithsonian Center for Folklife and Cultural Heritage.
